IPC's own Michele Waslin was quoted in yesterday's KQED article about the vetoed California bill that would have limited local law enforcement's ability to work with federal immigration authorities:

"The problem with [Secure Communities] is that the research that's been done so far has shown that a lot of the people that are being held under these detainers, the people that are being identified by ICE, are not serious criminals, violent criminals," said Michele Waslin of the Immigration Policy Center, a research and analysis group based in Washington, D.C.
